PREFACE.

In accordance with the instructions we received, our aim has been to render the "Preacher's Homiletical Commentary" available as a Pulpit Encyclopædia. The task as to size was somewhat formidable, and in several respects presented special difficulties. The work to be dealt with consisted of twenty-six volumes, with a total of no less than 11,913 pages, each volume being oftentimes written by several authors, upon widely different methods and in very varied styles.

Moreover, indexes to the separate volumes were not in all cases made, and when in existence, were upon no uniform principle and not prepared with the same aim as that of the present undertaking. But perhaps the real crux was how to index titles of a thoroughly homiletical type, when the whole point in these titles depended upon the passage from which they were deduced. As the work proceeded, a few guiding principles had to be adopted, and we now briefly name some of them, as they may possibly assist in the use of the Index.

A mean—we trust a happy one—has been adopted between meagreness on the one hand and repletion on the other.

The desire has been to index every really useful thought for Pulpit or Platform purpose, under all the words from which it would be likely to be sought by persons of differently constituted minds, or searching for information with different aims. In order not to defeat our object of affording real help for ready reference purposes, we avoided indexing every illustration or stray note or what had evidently only a passing interest.

Every main fact, every cardinal doctrine, every moral duty, every philosophical thought, every anecdote or telling illustration has been, we believe, faithfully noted and accurately indicated. There are about 3440 references to Main Topics in the volume, and under such words as God and Sin, there are no less than 257 and 160 distinct Sub-headings respectively; while the total number of the latter amount to over 18,000.

The titles, too, had frequently in regard to the headings of the sermonic sketches to be reduced in size, and reset, in order to make them fit into an index which would be readily available and free from confusion.

Again, too, in every single instance we have endeavoured that the main headings with all their sub-headings, should so read in the Index as to convey a distinct and definite meaning. In some few cases, however, the headings of the writers were so peculiar that it was impossible either to make them read smoothly or even convey a very definite idea apart from their context.

To avoid a needless multiplication of headings, the titles do not always read in the same way. Thus the article, pronoun, or small word commaed off at the end of a line may be read with and before either the sub-heading or the main heading. We give an example which will readily illustrate our meaning, and also make it easy to enter into the spirit of the Index:—

Christ –

Red Heifer an Analogue of the, The Example as the Servant of God, Our Reads—

The Red Heifer an Analogue of the Christ.
Christ our Example as the Servant of God.

We may here mention that no little time and thought have been expended with a view to making the headings symmetrical and uniform, so that the arrangement might be analytical and suggestive.

Special efforts, also, have been made, both by the Publisher and Printers, that the Typographical Arrangement should be as perfect as possible, and thus render the use of the Index a pleasant and not a painful exercise. The introduction of Clarendon Type for leading words and the adoption of a separate and unbroken column for the references to the volumes are special features made in the interest of the reader.

By following out these and similar principles of a scientific character, the work of making the Index has been less of a drudgery to ourselves than otherwise it would have been; and we trust the Index thus prepared will be helpful and welcome to those who use it. May such constantly find it a clue to the homiletical wealth which would otherwise be hopelessly hid in some five hundred quires of paper, and in a huge bibliothecal forest of nearly ten millions of words
